

The Route 7 Corridor: A Proposal for Optimized Community Development in Rutland, Vermont

Marcus Helm, Middlebury College

Data: Vermont Center for Geographic Information (VGI)

The largely undeveloped area surrounding route 7 south of Rutland City promises to become something that Vermont badly needs: an optimized community grown with a human approach. Immediate access to Rt. 7, the state's primary transit corridor, facilitates construction efforts while the existing diverse network of schools aid in attracting families and building real communities. The necessity of this development is underlined by Vermont's current housing crisis. Sensible plans for development focused on community building must be enacted to create a viable future for Vermonters.
